esophageal carcinoma. In the literature concerning the prognostic value of histologic tumor grading of esophageal carcinoma, contradictory conclusions are reported. This study was performed to evaluate the possible prognostic value of histologic tumor grading in a cohort of patients with squamous cell carcinoma (SCC) of the esophagus. Between 1987 and 1994, 103 patients with resected SCC of the esophagus underwent potentially curative esophagectomy. Pathologic tumor grade was determined in all patients according to the criteria of the World Health Organization (WHO). Univariate and multivariate analysis of the preoperative clinico-pathologic parameters was performed to determine the prognostic importance of histologic tumor grading.
Patients were followed up for 5 years. Significant preoperative predictors for survival were sex ($P = 0.02$) and lymph node metastasis ($P = 0.001$). Lymph node metastasis was the only variable to independently predict long-term survival in the Cox proportional hazard regression model ($P = 0.003$). Histologic tumor grade did not independently predict long-term survival.
Patients with SCC of the esophagus with a WHO grade 1 or 2 tumor are often diagnosed at a potentially resectable stage. This study suggests that tumor grade is not f678ea9f9e
